I can already feel the freshness of the crisp mountain air breathing down my neck as my hand touches that last button to complete a long day of frantic activity. I've left my last slice of pumpkin pie behind at the office. My coworkers have long since departed for the evening. My apartment is quiet. I know a level of comfort, but I should be calling it a night. The silence of this apartment and the feeling of comfortable accomplishment in my soul reminds me of the solitude of the early morning hours, the time when I live for. It is the time when the body lies still while the mind anticipates a new day. The contrast of this ease and comfort with that of my late night preparations for tomorrow makes me aware of the changes that have been made to my life. I was born to a world that was larger than life. I grew up in a world that would die around me. So I'm surprised that I still live for so long. I don't know how I made it past my 20's without having one of my normal existential crises. I'll have a glass of wine when I'm finished talking to you. I'm living for the day when I can ride my bike down to the beach. Or when I can drive into the next town and grab some dinner in a restaurant that doesn't have a menu. I live for the sense of accomplishment when the day's work is done, when my job is done, when I can lay my head down on my pillow without thinking about the stress of the day. I live for the 82157476af
